To whom it may concern,

Thank you for taking the time to review my cover letter and resume. I started my career as a Product Engineer and am interested in exploring opportunities in the web/software development field. Through my current role I have been exposed to this industry and have enjoyed the challenge. My team has a tool that utilizes web development to schedule work within our department. I volunteered to learn the code behind that tool and have been maintaining and improving the tool ever since.

Over the past year, with the help of online trainings and Google I have been teaching myself how to code. This displays my drive and self-discipline to learn coding on my own time. I've thoroughly enjoyed learning what I have so far and know there is much more to learn. I have been using that information to work on the scheduling tool and other personal side projects as well. This challenge has made me interested and eager to learn more about the field, and to discover if there are opportunities for me to enter this field as a career.

While my resume may not have all the experience that you desire, I know that I can make up for it with my curiosity and determination to learn and improve. I would love the chance to discuss opportunities as a web developer.

Thank you for considering me for the position. I hope to speak with you soon.

Sincerely,

Ryan Haefner
